to the profession's intellectual life. Their works are substantive both in terms of quantity, the sheer numbers of published works, but also in terms of their quality, or utility, being used by others. A substantial proportion of scholarly articles are never cited (Hamilton, 1990), further highlighting the significant impact the authors of very highly cited papers exert on the field.

One aspect of the results that is rather striking is that among the 10 most influential social work faculty, 8 individuals are found who are not themselves social workers. Only Steketee (#8) and Barth (#9) have social work degrees. The other eight hold doctorates in fields such as sociology (Hawkins, Catalano, Mechanic, Vega), epidemiology (Brownson), psychology (Bengtson, Jaccard) and medicine (Shear). These are persons housed in a social work program and undoubtedly conduct much high-quality work in the field of social services. Additional nonsocial workers appear throughout our list (e.g., Charles Figley), and our field is most fortunate that these persons have chosen to pursue careers within our academic programs. But does it say something about the quality of the research training obtained via
